ADEQ Moves Forward With Developing Rules For Advanced Water Purification

ADEQ MOVES FORWARD WITH DEVELOPING RULES FOR ADVANCED WATER PURIFICATION TO BOLSTER ARIZONA'S WATER SUPPLIES

PUBLISHED JULY 11, 2024

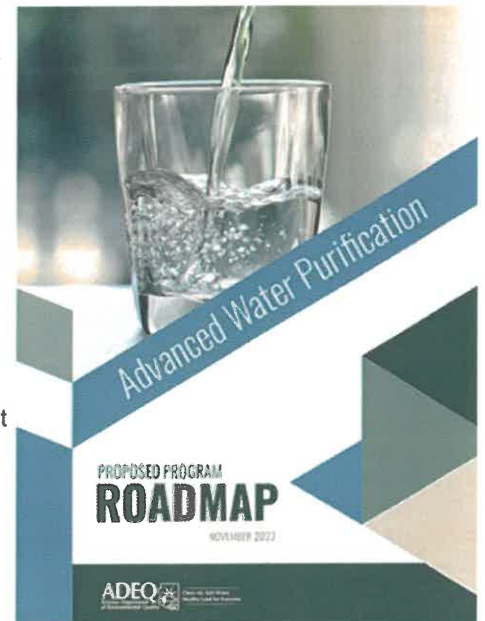

ADWR's sister agency, the Arizona Department of Environmental Quality, is moving quickly on a groundbreaking program designed to convert treated wastewater into safe, reliable purified water. ADEQ announced on July 9 its plan to release the draft rule for the Advanced Water Purification (AWP) Program. In a press statement, ADEQ said the draft rule is "the next step in ADEQ's effort to develop a robust regulatory framework for AWP that will give water providers another tool to diversify and expand Arizona's water portfolio, deliver safe drinking water to their communities and support the state's growing population and economy."

Arizona Governor Katie Hobbs lauded the program, observing that "Arizona has a long history of smart water management, and we must continue that legacy in order to secure a prosperous future for all."

"The Advanced Water Purification Program is one of many important tools we have to improve our water sustainability. This proposal will undoubtedly strengthen our already robust water systems and keep us on the right track," said the Governor.

The AWP program uses safe and proven technologies and already has been successfully implemented. Many of the technologies used in AWP are the same as those commonly used in processing strictly regulated products for eating and drinking.

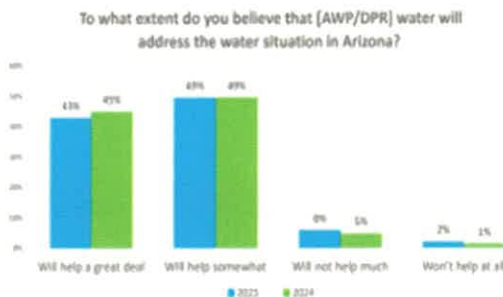

The agency's draft rule outlines the technical and operational requirements for AWP systems, drawing on proven methodologies and best practices, and input from ADEQ's Technical Advisory Group. ADEQ also has received technical feedback on its Advanced Water Purification (AWP) Proposed Program Roadmap, which it unveiled last fall.

"To adapt to this historic drought, we must turn to proven solutions to better conserve and reclaim water," said Arizona Senator and former Astronaut Mark Kelly. "We've used these Advanced Water Purification techniques on the International Space Station for decades, and today's proposal is an important step to bring this innovative technology to Arizona and make our water usage more self-reliant and sustainable."

Nearly all feel that AWP will help address the Arizona water situation

94% feel AWP will either help a great deal or will help somewhat, in addressing concerns around the water supply in Arizona. This was slightly higher than the 92% selecting those responses in 2023 for DPR.

Results of two blind surveys conducted in April 2023 and May 2024 with a total of 2,314 respondents who were Arizona residents, showed broad concern about the state's water supply now and in the near future. The survey subjects expressed support for AWP as a viable part of the solution.

"This draft rule is a significant milestone in our journey towards a sustainable and resilient water supply for Arizonans," said ADEQ Cabinet Executive Officer Karen Peters. "ADEQ is committed to protecting public health and the environment by establishing clear, science-based regulations for advanced water purification."

New Poll Shows Arizonans Still Believe Education Beyond High School is Important

NEW POLL SHOWS ARIZONANS STILL BELIEVE EDUCATION BEYOND HIGH SCHOOL IS IMPORTANT; COST AND CHILDCARE REMAIN KEY BARRIERS

Education Forward Arizona, as part of its Everything to Gain campaign, unveiled a second poll in an ongoing series for the state of Arizona. The results show that regardless of socioeconomic status, most Arizonans who never completed a degree or program outside of high school see the value of additional education or training. Costs—financial, time, and opportunity—are the major barriers to why Arizonans did not pursue or did not complete education or training after high school.

Key findings from respondents include:

Fifty-four percent say they would be better off with more education and training after high school. However, 60% say that cost kept them from continuing their education.

- Sixty-two percent of mothers cited the cost as a major barrier compared to 44% of fathers.
- Thirty-two percent of mothers said the cost of childcare was a major barrier compared to 22% of fathers.
- Fifty-three percent of Latino respondents indicated that working to support their families financially is a major barrier to completing education or training after high school, compared to 39% of their white non-Hispanic counterparts.

“Cost being a prohibiting factor is not necessarily groundbreaking,” said President and CEO Rich Nickel. “But it is revealing of the opportunity because many other issues that some consider barriers to postsecondary attainment - fear of coursework, lack of encouragement, fear of discrimination, political bias, and more - were virtual non-issues. According to this data, solving the cost issue and providing childcare options will open the enrollment floodgates. Additionally, a majority of the people surveyed agree that their lives would be “better off” if they were to enroll and complete education and training.”

Education Forward Arizona and Helios’ recent study, “Billions to Gain,” shows that if this issue is solved, all of Arizona stands to benefit, to the tune of $5 billion in new revenue. But Arizona hitting the Achieve60AZ goal—which is 60% of working-age adults having some form of postsecondary education by 2030 - is critical to achieving that new revenue.

Education Forward Arizona commissioned this second poll with support from the Arizona Innovation Alliance (AIA), a tri-university partnership between Arizona’s public 4-year institutions to increase postsecondary attainment through enhanced collaboration.

This is the second in a series of polls aimed at better understanding the desire and value for education and training after high school in Arizona. The first study found that Arizona voters, across the ideological spectrum, overwhelmingly support increasing the percentage of Arizonans with a degree or certificate beyond high school.

This comes on the heels of multiple op-eds calling for more investments in education after high school by elected, business, and education leaders in Maricopa, Yuma, Coconino, and Pima Counties.

Education Forward Arizona will unveil a new poll this fall, the third in the series, focused on potential solutions to draw Arizonans to education or training after high school. The findings will be a clear call to action for elected and business leaders to take essential steps to support learners across the state and benefit our economy.

First Things First Hualapai Region Welcomes New regional council member

First Things First is pleased to welcome Cliffiny Mowa as a new member of the First Things First Hualapai Regional Partnership Council.

These members help define priorities for the local services and support for young children and their families. By collaborating with other dedicated community members, regional council members provide opportunities for young children to get a strong start in life.

Mowa will serve as the child care provider representative. She is the administrative assistant for the Hualapai Day Care. She has 15 years of experience working with children of all ages. Mowa expressed that her goal is to help children grow and become good citizens to go further in life.

“Each regional council member represents a different facet of expertise and passion,” said FTF’s Chief Regional Officer K Vilay. “They bring an understanding of how important early childhood is and why it’s important for their community. They’re the voice and reflection from each of their respective perspectives in their community.”

The Hualapai Regional Partnership Council member is an integral part of a leadership team that provides direction and vision for achieving the First Things First goals within the Hualapai region. The Hualapai Regional Council is looking for someone with a passion for ensuring every child has every opportunity to succeed, a commitment to excellence in creating healthy, safe, and developmentally appropriate learning environments for young children, a belief in the strength of parents and caregivers, and a belief in the value of community collaboration. The regional council is looking for a member of the business community and a representative of a philanthropic organization.
